Market Strategy

A Political Dilemma Ahead

- Race for power. The Election Commission is expected to officially announce the results of General Election 2023 within 60 days from the 14 May election date – the announcement is slated for mid-July. Based on the preliminary results (Figure 1), both the Move Forward Party (MFP) and Pheu Thai (PT) parties won similar majorities in the lower house, with the MFP currently leading by only 11 seats. For now, the latter has the priority to form the new government until the House of Representatives elects a new speaker in early July. Parliament will then elect a prime minister in late July. However, if the MFP fails to establish a coalition party, PT will have the right to form one.
- The crucial number. It is crucial to understand that the elected prime minister must secure 376 out of 750 votes as per the Constitution. If the lower house fails to attain the necessary 376 votes, but manages to secure more than half or 256 out of the 500 members of Parliament, members of the upper house can either cast their votes to help bridge the gap or choose not to vote. Securing a minimum of 376 votes amongst both houses is essential for the MFP's alliance party to successfully pass policies and laws and uphold government stability. Therefore, this requirement holds immense significance. The MFP and its allies will sign a MoU soon and are searching for an additional 63 votes needed to support the new prime minister. At this juncture, it is evident that the ally creation process remains an unsteady one.
- Downwards revision trend. Fundamentally, we see many uncertainties ahead, ie a: i) Possible delay in forming the new government by early August and ii) caretaker government with limited ability to execute new projects and economic policies – a so-called political vacuum period. This may disrupt private investor confidence in Thailand. More importantly, we expect to see a weaker-than-previously expected outlook for 2H23 GDP. Consequently, the SET's earnings will experience a downwards revision. In this situation, domestic consumption, and the F&B, tourism, healthcare, and airport sectors are expected to perform well. Meanwhile, commodities such as oil and gas are considered safer, while the infrastructure, contractors, telecommunication, property & development, industrial estates, and utilities sectors will carry downside risks, in our view.
- Policy risks. There are several policy risks to be aware of in the coming months. These include uncertainties surrounding the formation of the coalition government, election of the prime minister, implementation of laws and economic policies, and search for new cabinet members and key ministers to regain public trust. Additionally, changes in the former government and market policies may impact the SET, potentially leading to an upside limit.

Eight coalition parties. A coalition of eight political parties has been formed that holds a combined 313 Members of Parliament (MP) seats – this meets the minimum requirement for Pita Limjaroenrat to be voted in as Thailand's 30th prime minister. Limjaroenrat's MFP party, two new parties, and five former opposition parties will soon sign a MoU to solidify their alliance, allowing them to effectively implement laws and economic policies. However, he still requires at least 63 votes from the Senate.

What comes next?

It is crucial to understand that, any aspirant to the Prime Minister post must secure 376 out of 750 votes. The upper house, which comprises 250 senators, can join the lower house's 500 MPs in selecting the premier. If the lower house fails to attain the necessary 376 votes, but manages to secure more than half or 256 out of the 500 MPs' support, the upper house can either cast their votes to help bridge the gap or choose not to vote.

Securing a minimum of 376 votes from parliamentarians is essential for the MFP's alliance party to successfully pass policies and laws and uphold government stability. Therefore, this requirement holds immense significance.

As previously practiced when it comes to electing a new prime minister – to prevent any potential conflicts or disputes during the transition period – it is imperative that senators refrain from participating in the selection process as they did during the 2019 election. It is crucial to highlight that the MFP – and its supporters outside Parliament – demanded that the Senate relinquish its authority to elect the prime minister when they were in opposition – however, they are now forced to seeking votes from members of the Senate. On the MFP's desire to amend or the terminate Section 112 (Figure 6), we do not expect the Senate to easily pass this motion.

The uncertainties:

- i. The vacuum period. The period between May and August – when a new coalition government is formed and the prime minister is elected – is one wrought with political and economic uncertainties. We believe such uncertainties could trigger disruptions in the disbursement of the current government's budget, thereby causing substantial delays in the approval of the next budget. In addition, under this political vacuum scenario, private investment in Thailand may suffer from a lack of confidence and see pending foreign direct investment (FDI) decisions being put on hold;
- ii. The status of the government. The coalition parties and number of MP seats determine the new government's status and stability. In this event, 313 out of 500 means a stable outlook. We note the ability to pass laws and policies effectively is essential, and the strength of such a coalition government is assessed by its ability to remain in power for the next four years. However, we are sceptical on critical laws that require Senate support;
- iii. Economic policies. In the event the MFP and its alliance successfully forms the new government, the market will then wait to see the look of its economic team, especially on who are chosen to lead key posts, ie the Finance, Commerce, Energy, and Transportation Ministries, as it will undoubtedly impact economic policies for the "better" or "worse". Our concern is that changes in government and leadership may lead to inconsistencies in long-term economic policies, which could prove detrimental to Thailand as a whole;
- iv. The concealed number (376 out of 750). We believe the MFP's campaign approach was an unfriendly one. Its extreme positions (Figures 5 and 6) could make it difficult for the party to garner support from the Senate – it may not even be enough bridge the gap. As it stands, to elect ministers and pass laws, the MFP and its allies must secure at least 63 votes in the Senate or 376 out of 750 in both houses;
- v. Weaker fundamental outlook. Changes in the government can have an impact on budget allocations and infrastructure project bids for the 2023-2024 fiscal year. The new administration may revive unfinished projects and end certain industry monopolies. Economic campaigns by the MFP may also reduce prices for electricity, public transportation, and fuel, which could affect particular industries, and impact FDIs and local investment confidence until public confidence is restored;
- vi. Expecting an earnings downgrade. We believe it likely that there will be corporate earnings and SET index target downgrades ahead;
- vii. SET Index: To be highly volatile and on a downside trend.

Safer heaven stocks. Under an uncertain climate, we prioritise healthcare, banks, tourism, ICT, and external play counters such as commodities-related stocks. We avoid infrastructure counters under this scenario because there is a possibility of a 2-3 month delay in terms of the FY23 budget disbursement and FY24 budget revision. We also do not expect new infrastructure project bids and execution during the new government's transition. There is also the risk of policy changers vis-à-vis the previous administration's policies.

Our Top Picks:

- i. PTT (PTT TB, BUY, TP: THB46; dividend yield: 6.3%);
- ii. PTT Exploration & Production (PTTEP TB, BUY, TP: THB183; dividend yield: 6.4%);
